

For in the day, Illaton did strive against the People of the Lord. And the People of the Lord did persist in fighting Illaton on the battlefield, and did resist Illaton's god, Danmunos, in worship. Illaton did become great with wrath, and called upon Kefetis, the high priestess of Danmunos. And she did call all manner of evil unto the People of the Lord, but yet they persisted. She called down hail, yet the People of the Lord held strong. She called down pestilence, yet the People of the Lord persisted. She called down flood, yet the People of the Lord held fast. She called down stars from the sky, yet the People of the Lord stayed with Faith, and she protected them from the evil. And Kefetis was horribly afraid, but she did hide it within her anger and horrible pride. And Kefetis worked a majick, to call down Danmunos to wreak havoc upon the People of the Lord. And she did this thing on an evil night, and Danmunos became as a multitude of serpents from the sea, yet he did slither on land. And the Lord spoke unto Its People, saying: Lay you down this night in Faith, and she shall have you all and protect you. And so it did pass that those of the People who had Faith did lay in their beds, and Danmunos passed by without molesting them. Those who were not with Faith did flee or fight in fear, and were devoured in agony. As day came, the serpents of Danmunos did flee the sun in many directions, and Danmunos did become separated from himself, and the mind of Danmunos became no more. Realizing this, Illaton took Kefetis to the slaughter, rending her into many pieces in supplication to the Lord. Yet the People were not satisfied with this atonement for his wickedness, and made Illaton lay next to his priestess. And there was much rejoicing.